Introductory Remarks.

There are many excellent works on the Theory of sight - singing, but in the matter of reiterative exercise, by which alone, facility is attainable, there appears to be a great lack.

The accompanying exercises have been prepared, for the purpose of meeting this want, and are so arranged as to give a large amount of practice upon each point as it comes up.

Theoretical instruction is left entirely to the Teacher, and it is believed that whatever the method used therein, this book will be found useful for practical work; not omitting those Tonic-Sol-Fa-ists, who justly aim at the eventual transference of their principles to the staff notation. For these the various key-exercises in Section IV will be found not more useful than the diatonic time exercises of Sections I & II.

It is requisite that the preparatory instruction and practice should be most thorough, each new point being well fixed in the ear, and made fairly familiar to the eye, through black-board illustration, or by such other means as the Teacher may be in the habit of using, before actually attacking the exercises. This is especially true of the Key-exercises of Section IV.

The book is divided into four Sections:

Section I. is made up of Diatonic time - lessons in one part, in the latter numbers of which the Diatonic gives way to the Chromatic.

Section II. also Diatonic and Chromatic time-lessons, but in two and four parts.

Section III. is given to mere interval-reading (in one, two, and four parts) without relation to keys. It certainly is a mistake to claim that no reading should be done thus. Passages are of continual occurrence that must be so read, as there is no time for analysis.

Section IV. is given entirely to key - exercises, and is planned to familiarize the student with all the major and minor keys, also to give a few general principles to aid in following modulations. In this latter point, is found the weakness of our staff notation for the ordinary singer. Changes of key are not sufficiently indicated, indeed cannot be followed except by one very expert in harmonic analysis. An improvement in this matter is much to be desired. I have adopted here the plan of indicating the passing key by Roman letters placed over the staff, small letters indicating the minor keys, and Capitals the major. (The use of this plan is not obligatory however).

Work on the whole four sections should be commenced almost simultaneously, and the relation maintained throughout. Some variation of the order of exercises may be instituted by the Teacher, to meet emergencies.

It will be found that these exercises can be used equally well by either Male, Female, or Mixed-voice classes, thus:

Section I. For Male-voice classes: Tenors sing from the upper stave, Basses from the lower.

For Female-voice classes: all sing from the upper stave.

For Mixed-voice classes: Sopranos, Altos and Tenors sing from the upper stave, Basses from lower. Or if it be desirable for the Tenors to learn the Bass clef, they can sing from the lower stave with the Basses.

In Sections II, III and IV the two part exercises are to be taken thus:

For Male-voice classes: Tenors sing from the upper line, Basses from the lower.

For Female - voice classes: Sopranos sing from the upper line, Altos from the middle line.

For Mixed - voice classes: Sopranos and Tenors sing from the upper line Alto from the middle, and Basses from the lower line.

In Sections I & II the use of syllables or numbers to indicate the intervals of the key should not be used. In Sec. III they are also undesirable, but might perhaps be used occasionally, after having been first read without them.

In many of the two part exercises the final cadence breaks into four parts, the Tenor part being printed in small notes. This of course is only applicable to mixed-voice classes. For Male-voice classes, let the Tenors sing the large notes in all such cases. In many places too, especially at the cadences the ability to always strike the key-note is pre-supposed.

Of course the exercises in four parts require Mixed-voice classes.

It will be found that for single voices also, much good practice may be derived from the use of the one, and two-part lessons. In the latter, the pupil singing one part, and the Teacher the other, afterwards exchanging parts.

This exchange of parts is much to be recommended in all cases, as a most beneficial exercise, and also as largely increasing the scope of the work.

In the Diatonic time-lessons, no key-signature is given, as the reading is planned to be done by interval only. In practice, the Teacher will give the class a key-chord at starting, using his judgement as to the best one for the special class in hand, having also some consideration for variety, and relief. In no case however should he go more than one tone from the key of C in which the exercises are written.

In none of the exercises, it may be well to remark too, is there any striving for melodic beauty, even had this been possible, with the unavoidable restrictions, it was felt that they would be more useful in a shape which should not lead the ear, but rather go somewhat against it; thus compelling concentration of mind-one of the most difficult things to obtain from the ordinary pupil.

It is not planned that any of the lessons should be learned; too much practice on any one should therefore be avoided. The principles involved should be thoroughly learned and practiced continually, but the exercises are to be read. It is for this they are so numerous. While they are not to be learned however, review is absolutely necessary, but no exercise should be reviewed, (after say two lessons upon it), until considerable time has elapsed; it will then come more as a new lesson; as the number of those whose memory will carry the melody for more than a week or two, is exceedingly small.

Part songs, Hymns, Anthems &c., should be judiciously introduced at the judgement of the Teacher; care being taken that none are selected requiring knowledge not covered by the exercises up to that point.
